Productivity got boost from WFH, but toxicity grew too

By Sujaya Banerjee

Work from home, or remote working, was an important convenience to facilitate business & productivity, and has in fact been described as the largest global transition programme in recent times. It served to purpose in a crisis, but not without a price for many organisations that struggled with under-prepared people managers, unfamiliar work processes and deploying technology for self-directed working, most times settling for 'best effort basis performance'.

Many claimed toxic work cultures developed during these times accentuated the displacement of talent as job markets opened up. For the uninitiated, toxic work cultures are marked by practices, policies and management styles that perpetuate unhealthy habits and constraints. Another leading research indicated toxic work cultures as being Disrespectful, Disloyal, Non-inclusive to diverse talent, Cut-throat competition, Abusive and if any of this sounds familiar, it will need urgent addressing as it is already impacting the talent pool, much as we may want to justify attrition as a 'market condition'. Here are some hacks to address toxic work cultures as being Disrespectful, Disloyal, Non-inclusive to diverse talent, Cut-throat competition, Abusive

There must be stringent criteria for qualifying to be a people manager. It's not just the need to reward the productivity and loyalty, it can set off a vicious cycle threatening retention at the workplace. Leader as coach is an important style every organisation must adopt to reduce the toxicity of power distance, and enable managing the dynamics of multi-generationed work. Transnational, bureaucratic, laissez-faire management styles need to be addressed by having mechanisms to track regular feedback. Command & control styles are passé. New age management styles are democratic. Servant leadership is the need of the hour with an ability to combine accountability with compassion.

Grooming people managers for everyday leadership by creating spaces for reflection and learning are key.
